The same effect, unless modified by other circumstances, is produced when the charge is increased w1th the same weight of projectile. In this case the projectile has to traverse a greater length of bore before the same relief due to expansion is obtained. The higher pressures which consequently rule, react upon the rate of combustion of the powder, and again a somewhat higher energy is obtained.1 1 Interior Ballistics. By Colonel Pashkevitch. Translated from the Russian by Captain Taster H. Bliss, U. S. Army. Washington, 1892. Observed pressures in the Bores of Guns There are two methods for determining experimentally the tension of the gas at various points in the bore of a gun, both of which have been tried more or less successfully. The first method measures the tensions by means of suitable gauges inserted at...
