Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .simply twice the freight rate, as in Germany, because in that case we should not be in danger of making a rate so low as to divert traffic from the railway to secondary express in those instances where the latter rate might be lower than the railway rate. Protective provisions are made for these conditions, however. Of course, there should not be a low Government rate in a given direction and a higher rate in another; and so the rates should have to be uniform for given weights and distances. The railways do not object to this, apparently, in the case of the express companies, whose rates are practically the same for differing directions throughout the country. To protect the railway from diversion of its traffic to the express in those instances where its rates may be higher than those of the Government it is proposed that the railway shall have the right to collect from the consignee the difference between its rate (ignoring the minimum rule) and the transportation loading for the fast-freight service. Thus, if its rate on a 10-pound package (one-tenth of its hundredweight rate) were 30 cents, and the secondary express loading were but 20 cents the railway should have a right to collect from the consignee, through the postal agencies, this excess of 10 cents. It is not thought this condition would be often encountered, and where it is the railway should be made to do duty as its own sentinel,...
